People know languages, but people change jobs. People move around and sometimes they just need that extra bit of training to make them confident and fluent communicators in their new position. We all know the typical examples:

- The back office guy regularly has to mail his American colleagues to discuss some details about the new service they provide. He knows pretty good English but is always looking for the right words to clearly define these new processes in written form...
- The financial analyst has to give a presentation in the German head office. Her German is OK, but she wants to make sure she uses the right words, making herself clear without obvious mistakes...
- The expat project manager has to explain construction workers what to do. He feels he can get along in Russian (чуть-чуть, нормально), but to make things clear some very useful phrases are missing. Sometimes his sentence structure sounds funny and he makes the workers laugh...

What these people need is what we call a "Language Drill". A short and intensive training course, that substantially improves their professional language skills in their current position. This course is practical, to the point and cost effective.

The language coaches from ElaN Languages will be happy to organize your tailored "ElaN Language Drill™", based on your company's needs and documentation, your specific job and your personal input.

And then we will practice and practice till you get it right.
